He noted that the course in information communication technology has its focus on the Knightline Program. The course, which is fully subscribed (46 students between two classes) uses mainly broadcasting as a communication media.

The Knightline Program has evolved from a live production to a pre-taped digital format. Programming on the local community is of higher quality and requires that the students write, produce, direct and edit their own program, which has an on-air time slot on the local cable channel. Students learn about dealing with deadline, creative expression is encouraged, and technical skills from interviewing people, to camera skills and editing are all included.
